A History of Lollipops

Lollipops are made from hard candy* attached to a stick*. To consume it you must bite* it or lick* it. According to historians, this kind of candy first appeared a few thousand years ago. There are archeological discoveries that confirm that our ancestors used honey to preserve* food. To make it easier to eat it, they stuck a piece of wood to the honey, fruit, nuts or other food and consumed it by licking and biting.

As time went by, limited amounts of honey and very low production of sugar almost caused lollipops to disappear, but all of that changed in the 17th century when sugar became abundant. Street vendors in London quickly started selling "lolly pops" in large quantities, although in the past this type of candy was normally softer than today's version.

George Smith created the first modern type of lollipop in 1908 and he named this candy after his favorite horse, whose name was Lolly Pop. In 1931, he patented this candy and its name. During the years after his invention, many companies found a way to improve lollipop production by inventing automated machines which could create up to 2,400 sticks per hour.

In modern times, multinational global companies have the capability to create a truly incredible number of lollipops every day, in many different forms and flavours.
